In what could be the most important chess match in history, the winner of the first-ever online world championship match will go on to a new title: "Internet World Champion." The match, first announced in 2015, pits GM Magnus Carlsen, the world chess champion, against GM Laurent Fressinet, a French grandmaster who was second in this year's FIDE world championship. This has been a hotly contested match — with four draws between the two — and a win for either player would be a huge milestone. The match will be held over four four-game matches online with video, starting March 12. The winner will be decided after each four-game match. In a press conference Monday, the winner of this match said he or she would be known as the "Internet World Champion." "If I were to win, it would be the biggest achievement of my life," Carlsen said. Fressinet said he was excited to be in the final match. "The previous four matches are always very exciting, but I feel this
