Lightroom (Adobe Lightroom 6.8) makes it easy to find, sort, edit, and showcase your images. In this release, you can control how often you receive email notifications for new images. If you don't, you can turn those off. (You can also decide if you want to receive email notifications for new comments and photos from your friends, as well as people you're connected to through online services.) Lightroom also has a new Import Wizard, which finds the best way to import your images and metadata (geotags — the new, improved, and smarter addresses used by the new Yelp Pro app — and Social Albums — the photo sharing apps from Facebook, Flickr, Instagram, and Twitter). You can import images into Photoshop via Lightroom or the File menu dropdown, but new files aren't automatically imported into Photoshop. You can still import individual image files into Photoshop, but you must do it manually, which is time-consuming. There's a new batch import wizard, but Drag and Drop isn't supported from the import tool palette; you can drag images into a window. The iPad's 12.9-inch display is too small for the iPad Pro's content. Would you use the smaller size of the iPad Pro for typical art or design projects, anyways? Sure, if it's just you and the print or screen is close by. But that's the whole point of using the iPad—to take it everywhere you go. Onboard displays are far too small for running full-on Photoshop on. The 11.6-inch Air Power Keyboard Folio is designed to be protective, especially if using an iPad Pro for a prolonged period. But your hands are more of a concern than a case I suppose, since your hands will cover up the screen quite quickly. I'm reminded of a time this issue was a big deal—you wouldn't believe how big—when the 3G iPad was released and Apple switched to its third-generation iPhone. The case-designs were dumbed down to the point where it looked like an old fashioned stylus pen was on the iPhone.
