Adobe has learned its lesson from the slow development of PhotoShop costs. On top of an under-powered processor, Photoshop CS's slow development forces Adobe to continue to ship Lightroom to enhance that platform. It has far longer hours to work. Even the development cycle has lengthened. The previous version, Photoshop CS6, was released in March of 2013; Lightroom 5 was released about 2017, December of 2017, to ship with Camera RAW. Not acceptable to many professionals. Adobe still has a problem with the notion that it shipped its full package. There is mixed opinion on whether this is a good thing or a bad thing. Those that don't buy Lightroom, or worse, don't even buy Photoshop, will never buy any additional functionality from Adobe. Whatever they do, Adobe has to keep new users thinking they must buy something else to add functionality. It's not much fun being one of those that upgrades every new version of software. It's a waste of money, time, and opportunity. Furthermore, Adobe will have a hard time selling any of its software packages. All it can do is hope the fine print of each contract specifies the customer has an option to convert to another package at least every 12 months, but likely every six. Obviously this review of Lightroom 5 is a very big deal. It uses AI, Adobe Sensei, to perform many tasks automatically. Lightroom has added functionality to areas and tools that used to be considered merely functional. This makes it much more than an imaging program. Lightroom 5 is a great deal more powerful, effective, and useful.

Quality is pivotal to any design. At the most fundamental level, designers prefer designs that align with the brand and ethos of the business, that include simple aesthetics. Fonts, graphics, layout, your project—all these are important to the experience of the final design. But it's impossible to deliver flawless design in a vacuum. You need to include images that visually support the message, emotion and information you're trying to convey. Images are often the final factor that determine whether or not your design passes or doesn't. And, you can't rely on basic design skills to create a finished look. Designing for the web requires special needs. Small screen sizes, quality image uploading and editing, and time-intensive projects are just some of the hurdles you'll face. Even though the evolution of computing power has made the tools and techniques of traditional graphics design much more accessible and available to average users, web pages and applications are entirely different beasts.
