Thanks again, eric I'm glad to know that your issue is fixed. However, I need to tell you that this new version is not a complete redesign of the program, it's just a major upgrade. As such, many bugs remain and there will be a new version, containing new and redesigned functionalities, in the near future. You can rely on the following email address as well for any future updates regarding this program: pmix99@gmail.com Again, thanks for your feedback. eric Last edited by ericfx; 12-22-2011 at 06:11 PM. Treatment of Pseudomonas aeruginosa with nitric oxide. Nitric oxide (NO), a potent antimicrobial agent and also a cytotoxic agent, was tested for its ability to inhibit the growth of Pseudomonas aeruginosa. The minimum inhibitory concentration of NO on P. aeruginosa cells was 8.00 mM. The concentration of NO in the cytoplasm of an Escherichia coli cell was calculated to be 33.00 mM at pH 6.00 and 35.00 mM at pH 7.00. P. aeruginosa was sensitive to NO (MIC 8.00 mM) in stationary phase cultures but in early exponential growth phase cultures, the MIC of NO was 16.00 mM. The effect of NO on P. aeruginosa was further investigated by measuring NO production, superoxide dismutase (SOD) activity, and reducing power. NO production was quantified by the Griess method and the SOD activity of P. aeruginosa cells was inhibited by NO. The reducing power of cells was not changed by NO treatment. The effect of NO on bacterial protein synthesis was evaluated by the incorporation of [¹⁴C]leucine into total protein and polypeptide fractions of P. aeruginosa in the presence and absence of NO. The level of ¹⁴C-leucine incorporation into total protein was unchanged by NO treatment
